When talking about a person who's into gardening and farming , we usually gonna think about someone senior. But today I want to about my friend Kristy, a young lady who's also interested in growing vegetables and fruits.

Well, what she started with some veggies , like zucchini and bean on her balcony as those veggies did not require lots of space and were super easy to plant. As Kristy gained more experiences and proficiency in growing those plants, she moved to a small house in the suburbs of my hometown where she could grow a variety of vegetables, herbs as well as fruits. Even since then, she has been trying to plant something new, like raspberries, cherry tomatoes and bell pepper. The reason why she chose them was that she had more space and usually the price of those plants are pretty high.

Moving on to how I feel about Kristy... well, first of all, I feel she is a kind of person who can find her passionate about life, finding the beauty of life from small things, like watching birds and butterflies to find treats in her garden, pruning those plants day by day or taking photos of her fruits. Not like most young persons who urge for instant gratification, she's willing to wait for the plants to ripe, being patient, even though growing things can be a long process. Also, what's special about Kristy is that she puts lots of attention on a balanced and nutritious diet as she has got used to eating fresh veggies and fruits direct from her backyard. I really want to become a person like her.
